Course Description: Reconstruction in America was a period of experimentation among formerly enslaved Black people about what it means to be free. These stories and struggles remain relevant for understanding contemporary geographies of the American South, despite the fact that white supremacist historians, institutions, and policies converged to purge many, but not all, of the material and aspirational projects for freedom and self-determination. A few decades later, historian WEB DuBois wrote "Black Reconstruction in America," the definitive text reinterpreting the Reconstruction era from the Black perspective. Beginning with a close reading of this text, this one-credit course explores the intersections between visions from freedom that took shape and were in some case made manifest in during the Reconstruction Era in the US and global struggles for justice. After reading DuBois' text, students and the instructor will work together to identify readings that help us make these connections, drawing on existing research and expertise as well as curiosities that are sparked during the reading of the text. The aim is to analytically "world" (Roy and Ong 2011) these struggles and aspirations by drawing topographical lines between the American South in the late 19th century and contemporary and ongoing struggles for freedom.
